This study evaluates the performance of an innovative bidding strategy for the National Hospital Quality Alliance accreditation program. In 2010, the National Hospital Quality Alliance began creating the first hospital-level approach to quality measurement and reporting. As part of this effort, the organization sought to establish performance domains for 60 acute care hospitals in the National Capital Region and award 15 recipients with a contract to be a site of the new quality measurement and reporting system. The research to develop this new approach encompassed both a technical task and an implementation evaluation. The technical work required conducting a content analysis of a sample of 15 hospitals' accreditation materials to extract and categorize the activities conducted during the accreditation process. The analysis used grounded theory approaches to identify key characteristics of each activity and develop clusters or categories to describe them. The implementation work involved completing focus group interviews with a national sample of healthcare leaders who had participated in a pilot site for the new accreditation approach. The results of the content analysis identified five themes for the evaluation, which were used to structure the interviews. Findings identified a lack of specific performance objectives at each site, and a lack of tools and resources to support the development of objectives and improvement initiatives. This strategy made it difficult for the recipient sites to collaborate with each other to achieve consensus on the creation of performance objectives and improvement initiatives. The best alternative strategy for the Accreditation Pilot was for the National Hospital Quality Alliance to continue to provide guidance and support for the recipients as part of a Web site hosted by the government, and allow the organizations to define their own performance objectives and improvement initiatives in collaboration with the government.In an effort to better understand the genetic basis of the neurodegenerative diseases and to develop new therapies for these debilitating diseases, the laboratory of Nicholas C. According to the invention, the first fixed frequency generator outputs a voltage of a fixed frequency according to the output voltage of the sensor. Thus, the first fixed frequency generator can output the voltage at any time regardless of the output voltage of the sensor and the output voltage of the second fixed frequency generator can be kept constant. Preferably, a contactor is connected in series between the output terminal of the sensor and the first fixed frequency generator so as to close the contactor when the output voltage of the sensor decreases below a prescribed value. When the output voltage of the sensor decreases below the prescribed value, the contactor is opened. Thus, even when the output voltage of the sensor decreases below the prescribed value, the voltage generated by the first fixed frequency generator can be kept constant. The contactor is preferably a triac or a thyristor. When the contactor is a triac, it is preferable that the prescribed value be 8.5 V. When the contactor is a thyristor, it is preferable that the prescribed value be 50 V or lower.
