2,000-year-old ‘witch hunt’ against Jews still continues on social media Dec. 12, 2013 9:03 p.m. - 855 (JTA) — Estimates of the number of people worldwide whom the Nazis killed during the Holocaust are notoriously difficult to nail down, and the Nazis were as good as their word about punishing the few who survived. According to the latest census estimates available, based on mid-1940s figures, there were around 5.4 million Jews in the world at that time. Last year, meanwhile, the Anti-Defamation League put the figure at 6.2 million. A recent and widely circulated “study” of Holocaust memory and Jewish self-identification on Facebook, which has spread like wildfire in Jewish communities, is far more pessimistic. Using data from the social media site and setting aside the 2.5 million Jews in Israel, the study surmised that at least another 3.7 million Jews around the world have been kicked off Facebook. The report concluded that “it is likely that the total number of Jews kicked off Facebook worldwide is in excess of 4.8 million,” according to the report’s authors, Edy Kaufman and Daniel Hoffman. The figure is probably too high, but the report illustrates the damage that hundreds

Bone is comprised primarily of calcium phosphate, which is a non-crystalline inorganic compound. Its chemical composition is about 60 wt% calcium phosphate and 40 wt% carbonate. However, bone, which is mechanically weak and is difficult to be shaped and adapted to a desired shape, has a complicated structure which includes cellular components such as collagen and bone marrow in addition to calcium phosphate. Moreover, calcium phosphate is quite chemically inert; a bone of a living body has been maintained under the aforementioned environment only by its highly developed bone forming ability and continuous blood supply in combination. In the recent years, interest in the role of calcium phosphates in biomineralization has drawn attention since it is recognized that calcium phosphates play an important role in the growth of bones and teeth. Inorganic calcium phosphates may occur in the form of various crystal structures. Among them, the most common ones are $\text{Ca}_5(\text{PO}_4)_3\text{X}_2$ (X represents Cl, OH, NO_3 or SO_4), referred to as apatite, and $\text{CaHPO}_4 \cdot 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$ or whitlockite, referred to as brushite. Whole bones and teeth can be considered as products of a process of biomineralization. Bones grow by an accumulation of minerals including calcium phosphate. These minerals are usually deposited in the form of calcium phosphate apatite. During this process, bones and teeth initially form amorphous calcium phosphate which then crystallizes into apatite. The amorphous calcium phosphate and apatite are accompanied with a mass of organic substances which are eventually dissolved. The bones and teeth can be regrown through a continuous process of re-mineralization by the so-called "remodeling." Furthermore, it is known that calcium phosphate is also used as a starting material to make, for example, artificial tooth. Recently, there are growing demands for various medical instruments and implants, which can be implanted in a body in combination with a biologically active substance such as a bone-forming agent and/or a living cell or tissue. More specifically, there are increasing demands for medical instruments and implants which can be readily implanted in a body by such a simple method as merely pushing a medical instrument or an implant in a body by using a rod, wire or needle. For this purpose, materials which are highly compatible with living tissues and provide their permanent shape and form should be
