One of the last pieces of legislation the Turnbull government brought through the Senate was legislation to allow greater use of the loaded 14-round clip. The Federal Council of the EJP group is calling for the right to vote, and for a coalition of Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal leaders to lead a review on Aboriginal human rights. They have also begun to criticize the Turnbull government for not providing adequate resources for Aboriginal programs, particularly education. If the EJP wants to actually establish a new identity for the Arrernte, it must do so through parliament. As the film points out, legislators at every level, including state and federal, have re-defined the Arrernte, protecting their privileges at the expense of everyone else. "I want to know, who does a tally?" asks the narrator. "Who counts the people who don't speak Arrernte? Who listens to them?" The leaders must answer this question. "And if it's a race, who's the colour of your skin?" The 2015 election is in two years. The people of the Northern Territory are not tied to the destiny of the Turnbull government, and the events of the past decade suggest that the government has little claim to deliver the future of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. "Reach the children - that's how you change the world," says Butler. "We are fighting for our children now. They are the ones who will drive the final nail into our coffins as individuals, and they can and will save us - they know who we are, they know where our weaknesses are." Victoria Playwright Hanan Morris says the audience was asking questions about the festival's choice of focus, "The Arrernte Nation: An Untold Story". She says the choice was not because it had only recently "emerged" from the history of the ATSI, but because the story of the Arrernte tells of what is still happening today. "The Arrernte Nation," says Morris, "tells about the current lives of Aboriginal people.
