I had eczema all over my body and I was constantly under a lot of stress. A pediatrician told my mom that because of that I had too much of the body's own medicine and that's why I was constantly hurting and itching. She told me to stop crying and told my mom to put some of my own skin cream on my hands, knees, elbows and feet. I rubbed it on every single day until one day I stopped itching and did not scratch anymore. I was 11, and I was happy. I felt good inside and out. People used to say that I looked like an angel. I became a different person. I started to dress and act more ladylike, and I had stopped drinking pop. When I got home from school, I used to rub my hands with my skin cream. I would take my bottle of skin cream and place it on my bedside table and have a ritual before I went to sleep. I would bring my bottle with me to school and rub my hands with skin cream while I was at my locker. When I got to class, I would rub my hands with skin cream and put it back on the bottle, and then put my backpack on my back. At school, I would stop at the nurse's office to have my skin checked. I had always been told that I had too much body medicine and that's why I would get upset and act out. The nurse would look at my hands and say that I did not have too much body medicine, but she asked me to make sure I used my skin cream all over my body. I would do that for the rest of the day. When I got home, I would rub my hands with my skin cream, put it back on the bottle and repeat the ritual before I went to sleep. I did that until I was 17. I had a good time with my skin cream ritual. When I was 17, I got a new skin cream. It was like a miracle to me. I rubbed it on every day. I had to rub my skin until it started to crack, but I was not frustrated or angry anymore. When I turned 18, I made a conscious decision that I was going to use my skin cream every day. I was not going
